

Measured measurement

Markus Aspelmeyer

Quantum measurements are usually thought of as instantaneous projections. Experiments with superconducting circuits now follow a measurement as it unfolds in time, and show how the back-action of a weak, continuous measurement steers the state of a quantum system. Such experiments open the way to feedback control of individual quantum systems and to tests of the foundations of quantum mechanics in a new regime of macroscopic devices.